“Diverse Leadership in Academic Medicine Improves Population Health: How Can it Be Achieved?”

Monday, March 23, 2015
12:00 – 1:00 pm
Room 1325 Health Sciences Learning Center

Dr. Molly Carnes did her undergraduate work at the University of Michigan and received her MD from the State University of New York at Buffalo. She trained in Internal Medicine and Geriatrics at the University of Wisconsin where she earned a Masters of Science Degree in Population Health. Dr. Carnes is a Professor in the Departments of Medicine, Psychiatry, and Industrial & Systems Engineering. She directs the Center for Women’s Health Research in the School of Medicine and Public Health. In the College of Engineering, with funding from the National Science Foundation, Dr. Carnes co-founded and co-directs the Women in Science and Engineering Leadership Institute (WISELI) and the Wisconsin Alliance for Minority Participation (WiscAMP). She directs the Women Veterans Health Program and the Advanced Fellowship in Women’s Health at the William S. Middleton Veterans Hospital. Dr. Carnes’ research has focused in increasing the diversity of academic medicine, science, and engineering. She recently completed an NIH-funded cluster randomized study of a gender bias habit-reducing intervention with positive results and is currently leading an NIH Transformative-R01 in which she and her colleagues are studying the process of NIH scientific peer review from several perspectives.
